MISOELLANEOUS READING. FUNNY SCENE IN A CALIFORNIA

THEATRE We suppose that very many of our city readers have seen Miss Eliza Logan, Miss Julia Dean, or somebody else, play "Evadne, or the Statues," by Shiel. One of the great points in the play is a scene where Evadne appeals to the King not to dishonor himself Northern Travel, Summer and Winter Pic- or her, and arouses him by thrilling allusions to the statues of her ancestors, which stand around on the stage. The statues are generally poor concerns in all theatres -merely some boards hued into the proper shape and painted, but in California they must be a leetle worse than here. With this explanation, we offer the following facetious yarn from the Shasta Courier: The thrilling tragedy of "Evadne" was being performed. The "shadowy representations" used on this occasion were the handiwork of the chisel of an artist yet unknown to fame, viz: Mr. Blake, the manager of the company, and of course were properly arin a subdued voice, replied: "You were speaking Of sculpture, sire-I do remember me, You are deemed a worshipper of that high art. Here, my lord.

Is matter for your transport!" And turning, she pointed to sundry remarkable imperfect statuary representations of John White Lies, a Novel, by Charles Reade, author of "Peg Woffington," &c., 1 vol. 12mo. sight of these representations of her "glorious ancestors" proved too much for her, and she went off into transports of laughter .-The king, contrary to all stage rules, followed suit, with sundry guffaws, and the audience joined in with a yell. When the laughter had somewhat subsided, the play continued with due decorum; until Evadne, turning to another statue, exclaimed:

"Behold! The glorious founder of my family!

It is the great Rudolpho.' When, of course, the king snorted, and the fair tragedienne stuffed a cambric handkerchief into her mouth. This scene was again renewed by the beautiful and virtuous Evad-Emersons' & Putnam's Magazine for March, ne's exclamation, as she pointed to a third statue: "Another of my ancestors, my liege, ludicrousness of the scene, without having first beheld the works of sculpture used on the occasion. We are quite sure that Mrs. Pot ter will never again attempt the character of Evadne, without, before the rising of the The Havelocks are of Danish descent, and were for many generations settled in Great Grimsby, in Lincolnshire.
